Se viene la semana del empleo

Tras la publicación de datos de inflación de febrero en línea con las expectativas, la semana cerró levemente positiva para las acciones. Así, cerraron un gran trimestre, en el que el índice global de acciones MSCI ACWI subió 8,3%, la mayor suba desde 2019. El presidente de la Reserva Federal, Powell, sostuvo que, a pesar de haberse estancado, la inflación estuvo en línea con las proyecciones, respaldando la posibilidad realizar tres recortes este año. Esta semana, los ojos estarán puestos en los datos de empleo. En Japón, el yen cayó a su nivel más bajo en 34 años a pesar del aumento de las tasas de interés. En Europa, la inflación se desaceleró más de lo esperado en Francia e Italia, y se anticipa una tendencia similar en Eurozona esta semana.

Semana clave para el empleo. Esta semana se conocerán los datos de empleo en EE. UU., con expectativas de pocos cambios respecto a febrero. Se prevé una ligera moderación en los aumentos de salarios de marzo, al 4,1% a/a desde el 4,3% anterior. A pesar de esta desaceleración, los aumentos salariales siguen siendo elevados comparados con el objetivo de inflación del 2%. Se espera una creación de casi 200 mil empleos en marzo, por debajo de los 275 mil del mes anterior. La tasa de desempleo se mantendría estable en el 3,9%, aunque algunos analistas alertan acerca de una aceleración en ciertos estados. Si bien algunos de ellos sugieren que eso se debería a una incipiente recesión, otros lo atribuyen a un aumento en la inmigración.

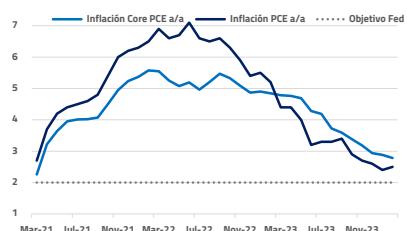

El yen sigue debilitándose. Tras la decisión del Banco de Japón (BOJ) de aumentar su tasa de referencia, se esperaba un fortalecimiento del yen. Sin embargo, éste continuó debilitándose hasta rozar ¥152 por dólar, su nivel más bajo en 34 años, generando especulaciones sobre una intervención del BOJ para detener esta tendencia. A pesar del aumento de las tasas, el yen perdió 7% frente al dólar en lo que va del año. La discrepancia en las políticas monetarias entre Estados Unidos y Japón debería fortalecer al yen. Sin embargo, los rendimientos de los bonos del Tesoro de EE.UU. a 10 años están 350 puntos básicos por encima de los de Japón, lo que no contribuye a fortalecer al yen.

Desaceleración inflacionaria en Europa. Esta semana se conocerá la inflación preliminar de marzo en la Unión Europea. Los analistas esperan una desaceleración con respecto a la de febrero. Se espera una inflación general del 2,5%, por debajo del 2,6% del mes anterior, y una inflación subyacente (excluyendo energía y alimentos), creciendo 3% a/a contra 3,1% en febrero. La publicación esta semana de alentadores datos de inflación en Italia y en Francia (2,3% a/a en marzo contra el 3,2% de febrero), dan más confianza en los pronósticos. Esto aumenta la posibilidad de un corte de tasas en abril.
